

Pequot Identity:

On the night of May 26, 1637, English colonists from the Connecticut colony attacked a Pequot settlement in Southeastern Connecticut near the town of Mystic. The settlers lit the settlement on fire and shot anyone who tried to escape the inferno. With most of the settlement's warriors gone most of those killed in the raid were women and children. In the years that followed further war along with disease carried by Europeans brought an end to the Pequot dominance in central and eastern Connecticut. By the 1970s only one elderly Pequot continued to inhabit the tribe's state reservation in the idillic town of Ledyard, Connecticut. Elizabeth George, living without modern conveniences, refused to leave the last 214 acres of Pequot land fearing that should she leave the state of Connecticut would reclaim the land and turn it into a state park. A tribe seemingly posed to become just another name in history textbooks was set for what would prove to be one of the greatest come back stories of all time.

Today the Mashantucket Pequot Tribe control one of the world's largest casinos with over 400,000 feet of gaming space, multiple hotels and numerous restaurants and bars, all situated on a reservation that has grown to over 2000 acres. The rapid ascent of the Pequot Tribe from apparent extinction to richest Indian Tribe in the country has not been a smooth road. The Pequot tribe remain under attack from opponents who argue they exploited a system through slick lawyering and back room deals to reinvent an Indian tribe long gone. At the same time that the Pequots have been confronted with claims on inauthenticity, other Indians seeking to become federally recognized have come under increasing scrutiny in the hopes of weeding out "wannabe" tribes. This paper involves a two part look at the question of Indian identity, the first focusing on questions of Pequot identity and claims to authenticity, and the second dealing with the effects anti-Indian racism has had on tribes, both those seeking acknowledgement and those currently recognized.

Opposition to the Pequots have become somewhat of a cottage industry with multiple books detailing with how the Pequots supposedly gamed the system and “invented” a tribe. The first major work on the subject was Jeff Benedict’s Without Reservation: How a Controversial Indian Tribe Rose to Power and Built the World’s Largest Casino, a book that supposedly sprung out of Mr. Benedict’s hope to find reading material at the local public library to fuel a second book he hoped to write.¹ Mr. Benedict’s tale was followed closely by Kim Eisler’s Revenge of the Pequots: How a Small Native American Tribe Created the World’s Most Profitable Casino and Brett Fromson’s Hitting the Jackpot: The Inside Story of the Richest Indian Tribe in History. All three of the books tell stories that have been labeled “compelling” and “fascinating” by reviewers, and indeed each is written in such a way as to convey a story ripe for a blockbuster Hollywood movie.

The story of the Pequots’ reinvention, as Fromson terms it, evolves in much the same way throughout the three books. Richard “Skip” Hayward, a man who had previously self-identified as white², bounced around the country failing first to run a snack shack on the Connecticut shore and then as a preacher in Maryland and Missouri. As Hayward and his wife had seemingly hit rock bottom, living in an unheated camper trailer on the property of Hayward’s lifelong friend, Skip decides to move back to the Pequot reservation in Connecticut. Hayward, had previously turned down Elizabeth

George's –his grandmother– pleas for him to relocate to the reservation and ensure the tribe did not lose its last piece of land. Yet George had died a few years before and the reservation sat unattended, only still available to Skip's relocation because of indifference on the part of the state of Connecticut.

Upon his return, Skip not only persuades fellow family members to return to the reservation, lured with the promise of cheap housing funded by HUD grants, but he also gets into contact with Tom Tureen, a young lawyer working in Northern Maine on a blockbuster Indian rights case. Tureen, working with the Passamaquoddys, was arguing that agreements tribes signed with state governments were unconstitutional if they were signed post-1790 and the passage of the Intercourse Act. The Intercourse Act stated that the federal government was the only entity that could sign agreements with the tribes, thus the treaties and any results from them were illegal. Tureen, working with the Passamaquoddys and other Maine tribes, ended up in a lawsuit that could have seen the return of two-thirds of Maine's land to the Indian tribes. Realizing that there were Indian tribes up and down the East coast living under similar agreements, Tureen and two associates began canvassing the seaboard in search of tribes that met the qualifications– a state reservation, agreements with a state, and a continued presence –for a successful suit. Skip met with one of the associates when he was still living in Connecticut and was visiting his grandmother on the reservation. Now Skip was going to lawyer up, sue the state for land and seek a monetary settlement along with federal recognition of the newly formed Pequot tribe.

In 1983 the tribe saw the successful passage of a settlement to their land claim suits, brought against landowners surrounding the small state reservation. The settlement, passed in Congress against the opposition of the Branch of Acknowledge and Research (BAR), the administrative method to gaining acknowledgement, gave the Pequots money to buy out area landowners and gave them the acknowledgment they sought. Congressmen, according to Pequot opponents, were charged with adequately investigating and questioning the Pequots' claims to legitimacy but failed to do so, either because of indifference or misplaced guilt about the injustices Indians had suffered. Opponents point to the fact that the Pequots failed to present documentation to the BAR until it was too late for the BAR to adequately review the evidence presented by the tribe. Had the tribe been forced to go through the BAR instead of leaning on support from politicians they more than likely would have been denied recognition, thus the illegitimacy of the current tribe.

Then in 1986 the tribe successfully exploited state laws to form a bingo hall, the predecessor to the current Foxwoods casino. The bingo hall was instantly profitable and by the end of the decade the tribe was looking for bigger profits. Continuing with the slick lawyering and back room deals that got them acknowledgement in Congress, the tribe exploited a Connecticut "Vegas Nights" law which allowed charities to run Vegas-style gambling once or twice a month. Under the Indian Gaming and Reorganization Act the tribe could seek a "good faith" negotiation with the state to form a gaming compact that would allow for a full sized, Vegas-style casino on the reservation. Attempts to repeal the charitable "Vegas Nights" law were met with resistance from charitable groups throughout the state, some partially pushed to opposition through Pequot lobbying. In the end the tribe got their compact, along with what amounted to a monopoly on slot machines in the state as long as they provided monetary kickbacks to the state.

The story of Pequot revitalization is far more detailed than the tale told here, but many opponents of the Pequots, including the aforementioned books, only expand on the story where it benefits their anti-Pequot position. For instance reading the books one finds tale after tale of failed businesses, lavish spending and “Pequots” showing up on the reservation from New York to Los Angeles. The Pequots under this narrative are not a tribe, in the beginning they’re simply Skip and his family and then groups of people seemingly only connected by the monetary benefits of the casino. What opponents fail to discuss, almost exclusively, are the affects of what Renée Cramer terms “cash, color & colonialism.” For one, had the Pequots sought to use their tribal sovereignty for something other than gambling most of these stories probably would not have been written. It’s a far more entertaining and provocative to tell a story about how a group managed to get special privileges that allow them to create a multi-million dollar welfare state for those lucky enough to find a relationship to a small number of Pequots from early in the last century than one involving Indians making money in normal business ventures. This group does not look Indian, and by Indian, one largely means a paternalistic image based on a stereotypical plains Indian. The reason for this, according to opponents, is that the ancestors the Pequots claim were full-blood Pequot were probably at best one-fourth, thus meaning today’s Pequots have minimal amounts of actual Indian blood. As mentioned previously, this line of attack repeatedly invokes the fact that the Pequots refused to seek acknowledgement through the BAR because they knew they would fail to gain it. This failure though is not a result of lack of Pequot

Indianness, but more so because of a process seemingly built to reduce the number of acknowledgements. The federal government has an apparent conflict of interest in that the more Indians it welcomes into the circle of federal-tribe relationships means the more money the federal government is required to pay. Thus the BAR process involves numerous requirements that some Indians claim can only be met by those who are not really Indian. This anti-Indian racist poses a problem for Indians other than the Pequots and will be discussed later, but it is prudent to address the question of Pequot identity as it is presented in two related articles.

The paternalistic and, at times, racist imagery of Indian authenticity runs through each of the aforementioned books in opposition to current Pequot success. Not only do these “Indians” lack the look of a true Indian but they also lack the culture any true Indian tribe should have. Fromson documents the complete and utter lack of a Pequot culture with a story about how high ranking members of the tribe stopped over in Hawaii, on their way to meet their Malaysian casino backers, and ended up singing “Your Are My Sunshine” when invited to sing a traditional Pequot song at the Polynesian Cultural Center.³ To counter perceptions of illegitimacy the tribe created a festival called “Schemitzun,” or Green Corn Festival in Algonquian (which Fromson states was though up by desperate research hoping to find something that sounded Pequot).⁴ The largest and most prominent sign of Pequot culture though is the Mashantucket Pequot Museum and Research Center (MPMRC), which features a Pequot Village, a descent through a glacier, complete with the sound of cracking ice, and a concluding room with Pequots themselves explaining what it means to be Pequot. Attempts to understand current Pequot cultural displays are discussed in two related articles by John Bodinger de Uriate and Mary Lawlor entitled “Imagining the Nation with House Odds: Representing American Indian Identity at Mashantucket” and “Identity in Mashantucket” respectively. For Bodinger de Uriate, walking through the casino itself shows the Pequots attempting to form a connection to a general, pan-Indian heritage. He points out the buckskin mini-skirts worn by the cocktail waitresses, the basket weave patterns and Indian colors adorning walls and floors as well as display cases of southwestern Indian pottery and large bronze Indian sculptures throughout the casino.⁵ Yet at the same time he argues one can see something of a “particularized Mashantucket Pequot identity...being supported,” partly in the famous “Rainmaker” statue within the casino. The statue of an Indian, one knee bent with a cocked bow and arrow pointed skyward, is situated on a large heavy planted simulated rock platform surrounded by four large, fake trees. At a major intersection within the casino the statue presents a narrative once an hour telling the tale of the end of the ice age and the early Indians who migrated to the region in search of the hunt. The narrative, according to Bodinger de Uriate, is a “‘neutral’ history...presenting a pre-peopled state, then sketches in an implied continuity from post-Ice Age peoples to current Mashantucket Pequots, primordializing the affirmation of a present identity based on a connection to a limitless past.”⁶ This narrative is the central piece of the MPMRC, beginning with the descent through the icy glaciers of the past and moving through the pre-contact period to trade, disease, warfare and finishing with the discussions by the Pequots. As Bodinger de Uriate concludes, “Mashantucket Pequot attempts at self-definition and autonomy must be understood as often antagonistic...processes of contestation between local definitions and discourses of self and the dominant narratives of racial essences...”⁷

Mary Lawlor looks to tackle the issue of “public identity” of the Pequots, or the identity the Pequots project for the non-Native audiences that visit the casino. For Lawlor, “the essence of culture at Mashantucket is a heuristic that projects its sources retrospectively onto a revered past, built up in the present from shards of memory, archaeologically honored materials, and a great desire to be as Pequot among the present-day Anglo population of New England.”⁸ While the casino represents Pequot identity mixed with the modern popular culture, the museum is a statement that, “a particular set of practices and ideologies once flourished here,” but because of inevitable issues of change and colonialism’s destructive path those ideologies “have been physically and socially buried over the course of generations.”⁹ The Pequots have inherited this culture and through the casino and other ventures are seeking to restore the means to have a distinct Pequot identity. Unlike Bodinger de Uriate, Lawlor finds the Rainmaker statue more “recycled bits and pieces of Indian stereotypes” played back to the non-Native customers.¹⁰ Lawlor also finds the museum somewhat over the top, almost Disney-like, which Fromson says is a result of Skip Hayward wanting to make the museum more of an amusement park than anything else. For Lawlor the long history of tribal games of dice and the fact that many of those games and their outcomes were seen as sacred provides a connection, rather than a divorce, to an important Indian past.¹¹

The issue of Indian identity and the opposition to the massive success of Indian gaming is not something simply dealt with by Pequots or the nearby Mohegan tribe. Indian gaming has provided huge issues both for recognized and unrecognized tribes. As Renée Cramer details “Anti-Mashantucket Pequot rhetoric becomes anti-Indian rhetoric; in the new common sense racism fueled by casino success, the Pequots are a trope for everything a ‘real’ Indian is not.”¹² Cramer discusses the various reactions of anti-Indian racism and the affects it has on other Indians in her article “The Common Sense of Anti-Indian Racism: Reactions to Mashantucket Pequot Success in Gaming and Acknowledgement” as well as her enjoyable book Cash, Color & Colonialism. As Cramer notes, “The view of American Indians, as poor, lazy, and primitive, and the countervailing belief that affluent and successful individuals cannot be ‘real’ Indians, is what anthropologist Kate Spide calls ‘Rich Indian Racism.’”¹³ Indians who use their sovereignty for tribal benefits are seen as getting special benefits. Opponents find nothing wrong with poor Indians, they see nothing wrong with tribes living on reservations and using their time to make baskets or traditional articles of clothing.

Some may even find this imagery appealing given the current hectic world many people live in. Cramer quotes Eve Darian-Smith who states

Native Americans often represent an idealized and romanticized vision of a past era, and a model of social relations no longer available or accessible to a majority of people. So it is important for the dominant non-Indian North American population to retain a belief that some resemblance of 'authentic' Indian still exist, which in turn bolsters a hope, though false, that a golden past could possibly be returned to one day.¹⁴

Opposition to Indian sovereignty and rights has at times become deeply offensive and something one would hope would not happen in the modern era. The state of Washington's Republican party adopted a platform in 2000 that called for military occupation of Indian lands, while in Alabama a legislative discussion on Indian tribal policing ended up in name calling, "war-whooping" and references to tomahawks and scalping. The lowest anti-Indian attack came from South Dakota where an ad placed in a local paper called for an "open season" to "thin out" state Indians, who were labeled, "Worthless Red Bastards, Dog Eaters, Gut Eaters, Prairie Niggers, and F——ing Indians." Hunters were told they would probably find these Indians in bars, waiting in line for welfare and in alleys filled with "empty wine bottles," "disposable diapers," and "empty books of food stamps."¹⁵

One striking thing found throughout opposition to not only Pequot gaming but also Indian gaming in general is the reinterpretation of the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act (IGRA) passed in response to California v. Cabazon Band of Mission Indians. The law has gone from a law meant to explicitly reduce tribal sovereignty to something that has vastly increased it. The Cabazon and Morongo Mission Indians had authorized bingo and card clubs, including draw poker, in 1980. Under California law the practices were allowed when run by charitable organizations, but Riverside County, where the tribes were located, banned card clubs. In 1983 Riverside County sheriffs raided the tribal card clubs and charged members of the tribe for violating the county law banning card clubs. The tribes argued that Indian sovereignty allowed them to continue operating the clubs regardless of the county laws. In 1987 the Supreme Court affirmed the lower court rulings arguing that, “sovereign rights of Indian tribes [allowed them] to engage in their chosen path to economic development, even if that path was bingo or card gaming.”¹⁶ The courts seemed to have opened the floodgates to Indian gaming and prompted numerous bills to be introduced into Congress attempting to limit Indian gaming. The Indian Gaming Regulatory Act, a bill Harry Reid labeled “the ultimate compromise that pleased no one,” was the solution that ended up becoming the current policy under which Indian gaming acts.¹⁷ The law set up three categories for Indian gaming, Classes I, II and III. The first class is traditional tribal games played for little money which is to be completely controlled by the tribes themselves. Class II games are games involving low wages (nickel slots or five dollar table bets) as well as bingo, lotto, and punch cards among others as long as they are legal anywhere in the state. In other words if a state allows charities to run bingo games, as most states do, the tribes could engage in bingo without state involvement. Class III is high stakes gambling including casino style games and pari-mutuel betting. To run class III gaming tribes have to negotiate a gaming compact with the state government, which is required to engage in “good faith” negotiations with the tribes. Once more, the IGRA regulates how revenue from gaming can be spent, requiring it to be spent on tribal government or welfare and economic development. In other words the IGRA, “Exemplifies the use of federal power to constrain tribal sovereignty,” as opposed to “conferr[ing] a gaming ‘right’ on Indian tribes” as many see it today.¹⁸

While the IGRA has been seen as a facilitator for Indian gaming’s growth, Naomi Mezey argues that it’s largely a failure and betting against basic economic principles. Mezey, writing in the Stanford Law Review argues that, “a tribe’s ability to benefit from the IGRA depend[s] on the cultural paradigm within which the tribe functions.”¹⁹ Mezey divides Indian tribes into three main groups, postmodern, traditional and “culture as negotiation,” the first two being the extremes and the third being the majority of Indian tribes. The Pequots, a postmodern tribe with little connection to past experiences, have largely formed a culture through gambling. Gambling revenue has allowed the tribe to build a museum, hire an anthropologist to investigate reservation campsites, and, as one member states, “To practice sovereignty.”²⁰ While the IGRA requires tribes to surrender sovereignty in order to engage in high stakes gambling, to the Pequots they have gained sovereignty where they had none in the past. Having the ability to operate a casino while others cannot is sovereignty to the tribe, even if it means negotiating with the state. Indeed working with the state and federal governments seems like a small price to pay, a sign of good will, in order to maintain their sovereignty.²¹ However if the Pequots (and other postmodern tribes) are the ones best suited to meet the IGRA's requirements they are probably the group with the weakest claim to its benefits, according to Mezey. For one the Pequots do not look like the paternalistic image of an Indians the IGRA is predicated on, second their location provides them easy access to customers and markets, meaning other non-gambling ventures were open to them whereas they would not be to remote tribes.

¹⁹ Mezey, p. 711.

²⁰ Ibid., p. 727.

While the Pequots may be best suited to use the IGRA those Indians who seem the most in need of the IGRA are the ones who either cannot or refuse to use the act. Traditional Indians, largely poor and living on remote reservations, seem to be the Indians the government is meant to help, yet the IGRA requires the tribes to surrender sovereignty and engage in practices counter to tribal traditions. These tribes at one point had true sovereignty and live in cultures largely in opposition to capitalism and the monetary culture the IGRA hopes will solve their problems. As Mezey writes, for these tribes the law "focuses on money when the problem is sovereignty and cultural identity."²²

The final classification Mezey documents is those tribes who weigh the issues of poverty and its affect on tribal sovereignty. Many, she writes, "Had to consider that at some point poverty itself would erode sovereignty as Indians fled the reservation in search of work and as those who stayed became desperate."²³ Unlike creating a culture or forcing the rejection of a culture, the IGRA for many in the “culture as negotiation” paradigm see the law providing a means to reconnect with a culture that was slipping away. Mezey documents the case of the Oneidas in Wisconsin, who now have a casino and can repopulate their reservation with the help of good paying jobs and social services unattainable beforehand.²⁴ In this paradigm tribes are most suited to make the sacrifices to take advantage of the law while not losing an identity in the process. Furthermore, to return to the paternalistic image of Indians, they look much more like the Indians envisioned as benefiting from the law than the Pequots.

²² Ibid., p. 730.

²³ Ibid., p, 733.

Even if the vast majority of tribes are willing to weigh the issues and benefits of the IGRA the law is deeply flawed. For one gaming, and any economic business, requires patrons, yet many tribes live far from any meaningful source of patronage. Second, as more Indians see the benefits of casinos and push towards creating their own they threaten to oversaturate the market. The Pequots lost millions with the opening of Mohegan Sun, located near Foxwoods and closer to the highway, and stand to lose millions more should other Indian tribes manage to create casinos in the New York-Boston market. In the end Mezey is forced to conclude that, “If the IGRA means to benefit all Indians as a group...[it] is woefully inadequate to the task.” On the other hand, “If Congress envisioned the individual Indian tribes as the IGRA’s beneficiaries, then the Act is better suited to its goal.”²⁵

Growing up in Connecticut the question of Pequot identity posed an interesting and confusing problem. Throughout the time I spent growing up in Connecticut Indians in the region became synonymous with gaining a casino check. For many in Southeastern New England there is no such thing as Indians still living in the region, what is there today are collections of whites and blacks connected by tedious relationships outside of a desire for money. Anti-Indian racism is seen throughout a state that is otherwise incredibly liberal. When the Golden Hill Paugussetts had their tax-free smoke shop on the reservation raided for tax evasion, the Hartford Courant ran an editorial cartoon with six black men (the Paugussetts are largely black) with names such as “Chief So Sioux Me” and “Nike Hide Tanner.”²⁶ The tribe also sought federal acknowledgement while not hiding the fact that should they achieve recognition they would seek to build a casino near Bridgeport, Connecticut (at the time they had an agreement with a New York real estate developer). The tribe was rejected by the BAR along with the Schaghticoke Indian tribe and the Eastern Pequots, both located near the Mashantucket Pequots.

When I first sent out to review the literature surrounding questions of Pequot identity I felt the biggest question was whether or not the Pequots were legitimate Indians, an issue partly predicated on a definition of Indian authenticity that was misguided. How does one actually define who or what is an Indian? If a reasonable solution to that problem can be found, how do we carry out acknowledgement in a way to divorce it from the violent opposition to being Indian in today’s modern society? In other words, as I moved from from books opposed to Pequot success, through issues of what Pequot identity is and concluding with discussions of the IGRA and acknowledgement, the issue became not whether the Pequots are or are not Indians but the issues faced by other tribes. At various points since the IGRA and the explosion of Indian gaming there have been some attempts to further limit gaming or question Pequot identity, but by and large the Pequots have nothing to fear. I find no reason to doubt Pequot claims to an Indian identity or to oppose their casino profits (in fact given the serious financial issues facing the state of Connecticut I welcome the revenue generated). What I do have questions about is the process by which we certify Indians, whether it be through the administrative BAR, Congress or the courts. The current process seems to not only be constructed in a way to limit Indian tribal recognitions but is also prohibitively expensive and time consuming, meaning that many Indians who wish to seek acknowledgement not only face conforming to the BAR's definition of Indian but also having to find out how to pay for it. Those Indians left unrecognized have not failed to gain recognition because they are not real Indians, but because of catch-22s their ancestors were forced to confront. Living on state reservations largely ignored by state governments Indians were forced to decide whether to remain on the reservation in poverty where they could be removed by governments for their personal "benefit" or move to cities to seek work in the non-Indian society. Many Indians chose the latter of these two options hoping they could make a living while at the same time keeping some connection to their culture. But leaving the reservation and assimilating with the non-Indian population destroyed the requirements the federal government deemed necessary to be Indian.

In the end the issue is how do we fairly identify Indian tribes petitioning to seek recognition? Some have made the case that an independent commission would improve the recognition process and help to shield it from issues of racism and colonialism in the current system. However, I mirror the conclusion of Renée Cramer in Cash, Color & Colonialism, the process will never be fully divorced from the issues we currently see. As Cramer writes, “Quite simply, fairness in acknowledgement processes will not be achieved by pretending that there is no colonial past with continuing racial and economic repercussions.”²⁷ The issue of tribal acknowledgement is one that is still evolving and it will be interesting to continue to follow the policy into the future.
